THE DIMINISHING DIVIDE ...

AMERICAN CHURCHES, AMERICAN POLITICS

Religion is a strong and growing force in the way Americans think about politics. It has a bearing on political affiliation, political values, policy attitudes and candidate choice. Its increasing influence on political opinion and behavior rivals factors such as race, region, age, social class and gender.

More specifically, religion has a strong impact on the political views of Christian Americans who represent 84% of the voting age population. Christian political conservatism is associated with every religious dimension covered in The Pew Research Center For The People & The Press survey. Regardless of denomination, people who express more faith are more conservative. People who engage in more religious practices are more conservative. Those who say religion plays a very important role in their lives are more conservative. The Center's polling finds indications that religious influences lead to a more liberal position on some issues, but there is little indication of a coherent pattern of liberal belief associated with any major religion or religious group.

The full effect of religion on American politics is best observed when race is factored into the equation. The conservatism of white evangelical Protestants is clearly the most powerful religious force in politics today. Analysis of the survey reveals that the most meaningful distinction is between Protestants who self-identify as evangelical or born again vs. those who do not. While the classification cuts across denominational lines, Baptists make up the largest share of evangelicals. Mainline denominations such as Methodists, Lutherans and Presbyterians are predominant among non-evangelical Protestants.¹

White evangelical Protestants are not only much more conservative on policy questions that involve moral issues such as abortion, laws regarding homosexuality and family issues. But, they are also more conservative on a range of political values including environmentalism and beliefs about international security. Their greater conservatism on non-moral issues is independent of other factors in their backgrounds, such as income or the prevalence of evangelicals in the South according to analyses conducted for this study.

Rather these patterns reflect the increased politicalization of white evangelical Protestants. Compared to a decade ago, a greater percentage of them now self-identify as Republicans. The GOP has not made as many conversions among non-evangelical Protestants nor among white Catholics. Republican affiliation among white evangelical Protestants grew 9% points between 1978 and 1987 and 7% points more between 1987 and 1995.²

White evangelical Protestants have been much more critical of Bill Clinton than other white Christians. For example, in June of 1988 white evangelical Protestants gave 7% points more support than did non-evangelicals to George Bush when pitted against Michael Dukakis. That margin has swelled to 18% points in comparative support for Bob Dole.

* Based on 9,652 interviews conducted from July 1994-October 1995

White evangelical Protestants now represent 24% of registered voters, up from 19% in 1987. They also make up a greater share of voters who self-identify as Republicans (34% vs. 26%)³. White Catholics and white non-evangelical Protestants also now each represent about one-fourth of the electorate. Black Christians constitute 8% of registered voters, non-religious Americans⁴ 6%, Hispanic Catholics 2%, Mormons 2%, Jews 2%, Orthodox Christians 1% and other religions 2%.

Americans report a significant amount of politicking from the pulpit, but it is not only occurring in the Baptist churches of white evangelical Protestants. Divisive moral issues such as abortion and prayer in school are being raised in church almost as often as traditional issues of conscience such as hunger and poverty and world trouble spots like Rwanda or Bosnia. Fully 60% of churchgoers say their clergy speak out about abortion and almost as many, 56%, cite prayer in schools. Individual churches clearly differ in the issues they speak out on.

Catholics hear about abortion (75%) and right to die laws (38%) more often than other churchgoers. White evangelical Protestants hear more frequently about abortion (66%), but their clergy also talk about pornography laws (59%), prayer in schools (71%) and laws about homosexuality (45%) more often than the average. African American churches have a mixed liberal/conservative political agenda. Black Christians are much more likely to have heard about health care reform (62%) from their ministers than white Christians (19%), but they just as often hear them speak out on prayer in schools (73%). Mainline Protestants report less talk in their churches about a range of contemporary political issues than do other religious groups.

As many as one-in-five churchgoers say that their clergy speak out on candidates and elections. However partisan politicking from the pulpit is reported much more often by African American Christians (47%) and by white evangelical Protestants (20%) than by white Catholics (12%) or by white mainline Protestants (12%). Reflecting this pattern, nearly one-in-five white evangelical Protestants (18%) and an even larger percentage of black Christians (29%) said that campaign information was made available in their churches prior to the 1994 midterm elections. About one-in-twenty mainline Protestants or Catholics made such reports.

The connection between politicking from the pulpit and public opinion is more apparent among some religious groups than others. White evangelical Protestants have the most ideologically consistent point of view. Besides taking strong conservative positions on the moral issues (such as opposition to abortion and gay marriages), they also are more apt than other white Christians to oppose handgun control and sending troops to Bosnia. White evangelical Protestants are less in favor of disseminating birth control information to teenagers and less certain that women in the work force is a good thing.

A Catholic Schism

White Catholics and mainline Protestants are less consistently conservative on moral issues. Majorities oppose gay marriages, but most in both groups take a pro-choice position on abortion. There is an indication of a clear ideological schism within the Catholic population. As many as 41% of self-defined "progressives" favor gay marriages, compared to 24% among "traditionalist" Catholics. The two groups, which divide the Catholic population about evenly, also differ on abortion. Fully 73% of progressive Catholics support the availability of abortion, versus 43% among traditionalists. Few differences are seen in the views of the two Catholic groups on non-moral issues, except on the question of immigration and sending U.S. troops to Bosnia. Progressive Catholics divide evenly as to whether immigrants are a burden to the country or strengthen it. But a clear majority of traditional Catholics have a negative view of newcomers to the United States. On the issue of Bosnia, a majority of progressive Catholics favor U.S. involvement while a majority of traditional Catholics oppose it.

Progressive Catholics come closest to fitting the description of a religiously-based liberal group -- but they are nowhere near as consistently liberal on a broad range of issues as white evangelical Protestants are conservative. They are better described as moderates, which is the political label a 51% majority of the group applies to themselves.

The views of black Christians reflect the mixed liberal/conservative agenda of their clergy. On the one hand, they express less support for the death penalty and more support for helping the poor than do other Christians. On the other hand, they oppose gay marriages and on balance take a pro-life position.

Those who profess no religion, who are mostly people under the age of 40, are predictably more liberal on moral issues -- 74% are pro-choice, 45% favor gay marriages -- but they are not much more liberal on issues such as helping the needy, support for the environment, opposition to the death penalty or having a favorable opinion of immigrants.

Acknowledging Religion's Impact

In follow-up questions the Center survey respondents acknowledged the importance of religion to their thinking about important policy questions, particularly those that their clergy emphasize. A 37% plurality said religion most influenced their views about gay marriages. Education (17%) and personal experiences (10%) were the factors mentioned next most often. Religion was also most often cited as shaping views about abortion. Many interviewees (18%) said that religion is the most influential factor in their opinion of the death penalty, but about as many mentioned education (21%) and media (21%). In contrast, relatively few thought that religion was central to their opinions about welfare, the environment or women in the work force.

Abortion	28	22	18	7

Welfare	6	24	26	22
Working Women	4	23	45	7
The Environment	3	36	22	24

NOTE: See questions 13-15 in the questionnaire for wording.

Personal experience was often cited as the dominant influence on views about working women, helping the needy and the environment. The news media was given credit by respondents for its effect on their thinking about Bosnia, the environment, welfare and the death penalty. Education was mentioned by a significant percentage as an important influence on every issue, but particularly with regard to the environment.

Not too surprisingly those who say their views on abortion and gay marriages were influenced by religion take more conservative positions than those who cite other factors. But those with religion-based views on the death penalty more often oppose it (41%) than do those who attribute their positions to their education (17%) or to the news media (10%). Similarly, the small number of Americans who say that their views about welfare are religion-based are much more apt to favor more money for the needy (75%) than those who point to other factors (47%).

Church, State Divide Slipping

There is more public acceptance of the role of religion and clergy in the political process than there was 30 years ago, but concerns nonetheless remain about how much political power specific religions have these days. In 1965 the Gallup Poll found that Americans by a margin of 53% to 40% thought that churches should keep out of political matters, and only 22% thought it was ever right for clergy to discuss political candidates or issues from the pulpit. In 1996 the balance of opinion has changed -- by a 54% to 43% margin, the public thinks the churches should express their views on day to day political and social issues, rather than staying out of politics. And 29% now favor outright politicking from the pulpit.

The division of opinion on these issues surprisingly occurs more along religious lines than along partisan ones. By a margin of almost three-to-one black Christians and white evangelical Protestants think that it is okay for the churches to be involved in politics. However, white Catholics and white mainline Protestants split evenly on the issue. Only majorities of progressive Catholics and the non-religious think the churches should stay out of politics. Remarkably similar majorities of Republicans, Democrats and Independents express support for church political involvement.

Less Political Power For "Them"

While in principle Americans approve of churches expressing their views on political matters, a plurality of Americans wants each of the major religious groups in America to have less influence on politics and government than they now do. By a margin of 44% to 33% the public thinks that Protestants should have less rather than more political power. Somewhat greater margins want to see Roman Catholics (53% to 27%), evangelicals (51% to 27%) and Jews (49% to 27%) have less power.

Most white evangelical Protestants want to see Protestants and evangelicals have more political power. But non-evangelical Protestants want these religious groups to have less political power and influence. Protestants of all varieties favor less influence for Roman Catholics. Catholics themselves are divided about the political influence of their own church -- traditionalists, on balance, want to see the church have more power, while progressives want to see it less influential. White mainline Protestants and white Catholics, as well as the non-religious, think Jews should have less political influence, but black Christians and white evangelicals are more evenly divided on the question.

Other Findings...

- ◆ Just 16% think of Bill Clinton as very religious and 52% consider him somewhat religious. Somewhat fewer see Hillary Clinton as religious -- 11% very, 45% somewhat. Reagan was rated similarly to Clinton (18% very, 50% somewhat). But, fully 48% rated Jimmy Carter as very religious. While fewer Americans know about Bob Dole's religious commitment, those who have an opinion judge him about the way Clinton is rated.
- ◆ About one-in-three Americans think that the news media portray very religious people unfairly (35%). A similar percentage (36%) believes news organizations are biased against fundamentalist Christians. However, discontent with media coverage is much greater among people with strong religious commitment (50% complain) and among white evangelical Protestants and black Christians (58% and 44% are displeased, respectively).
- ◆ By a 59% to 40% margin, swing voters (those loosely committed to Clinton or Dole plus the undecideds) reject strict limits on, or the prohibition of, abortion. But, they oppose gay marriages 65% to 27%.
- ◆ The Christian Coalition gets a mixed rating from the public at large (45% favorable, 35% unfavorable), but a better one than Pat Robertson receives (29% favorable, 48% unfavorable). The Christian Coalition gets a 64% favorable rating from white evangelical Protestants.
- ◆ Only 7% of voters think of themselves as members of the "religious right".
- ◆ Although the Pope gets a 93% favorable rating from American Catholics, only 40% of progressive Catholics have a very favorable opinion of the Pontiff.
- ◆ The GOP is preferred over the Democrats by a 45% to 34% margin as the party most concerned with protecting religious values. That margin swells to 56% to 26% among white evangelical Protestants. Even as many as 34% of black Christians think the Republicans care more about religion than the Democrats.
- ◆ Most Americans (62%) feel neither party is too closely tied to religious leaders these days -- 19% believe the Republicans are, 4% say the Democrats. But, 35% of those who profess no religious affiliation fault the GOP for its religious connections.
- ◆ Christian media have large audiences -- 45% say they tune in to religious programs on radio or TV, and 45% listen to religious music. A 57% majority of those 50 years of age and older use Christian broadcast media.

In the sections that follow, the relationship between religion and politics is examined in more detail. Section I provides a profile of religion in America today, including religious affiliations, religious practices and beliefs. The link between religion and basic political attitudes is covered in Section II, and the connection between religion and values is presented in Section III. Section IV looks at the extent to which religion influences views on policy issues. Finally, Section V addresses politicking in American churches, outlining the issues discussed from the pulpit, as well as churchgoers' opinions about the role of the church in political debates.

I. RELIGION IN AMERICA

Basic Religious Identification

America is overwhelmingly a Christian nation. Protestants (58%) and Catholics (24%) account for more than 80% of the voting age population. Those who profess no religion or say they are atheists are 8%. Two percent are Jews, 2% Mormon, 1% Orthodox and 3% other non-Christian.⁵

Among the Protestant groups, Baptists comprise the largest denomination (18%), followed by Methodists (10%) and Lutherans (6%). All other denominations are only 5% or less of the voting age population.

White Protestants divide evenly between those who say they are evangelical or born again (23%) and mainline Protestants who do not self-identify this way (22%). Among white mainline Protestants, Methodists are the largest group (6%), closely followed by Lutherans (4%) and Baptists (3%)⁶. But Baptists outnumber Methodists by a three-to-one margin (10% vs. 3%) among white evangelical Protestants. Catholics divide evenly between those who say they are "traditional" in their faith (11%) and those who label their religious beliefs as "progressive" (10%).

Blacks are predominantly Protestant (8 of 10%), while Hispanics are mostly Catholic (2 of 4%). But many Hispanics are Protestant (1 of 4%). Evangelicals predominate among black Protestants and Hispanic Protestants.

Half of Evangelicals in South⁷

White mainline Protestants and white Catholics mirror the general public on basic demographic measures such as sex, age, education, and income. However, perhaps contrary to their public image, white evangelical Protestants are also mostly in the demographic mainstream. Compared to the nation as a whole, they have only somewhat less formal education and their ranks include a slightly larger percentage of low income families. But, white evangelical Protestants are distinguished by their concentration in the South (49%), and large numbers live in either small cities and towns or rural areas (69%).

Among Jews, one-half are college educated, compared to one-fifth of the public (51% vs. 21%). Jews are also more likely to earn $75,000 or more in annual income (20% vs. 8%), to reside in the East (45% vs. 21%), and to live in either a large city (39% vs. 20%) or a suburb (32% vs. 22%). Those who profess no religious affiliation are predominantly male (64%) and highly likely to be under 30 years of age (37%), college educated (31%), and to live in the West (34%). Only one-third (32%) of this group were not active members of a church when they were growing up; one-third were Protestants and slightly more than one-fifth (22%) were Catholics.

While black Christians tend to be female (57%) and live in the South (57%), black non-Christians are predominantly male (53%), and they are almost as likely to live in the Northeast (33%) as in the South (40%). In addition, black non-Christians are more likely than black Christians to be under 30 years of age (41% vs. 27%) and to live in large cities (51% vs. 36%). [See Demographic Profile, p.36]

Some Slippage of Religious Faith Since '60's

Americans hold very strong religious beliefs. Six-in-ten (59%) Americans feel religion is very important in their life, and nearly three-quarters are absolutely certain about their belief in God (72%). But more faith was expressed in a 1965 Gallup survey, in which 70% of respondents said religion was very important to them, and 81% professed certainty about belief in God. The decline in the importance of religion became apparent in Gallup Organization surveys in the late 1970's.

A large majority of the public feel the Bible is the actual word of God (82%), though there is a division of opinion as to whether or not the Bible should be taken literally, word for word (35% vs. 47%). Fully four-fifths of the public currently believes in the after-life, and not surprisingly, belief in heaven is more prevalent than belief in hell (70% vs. 57%).

Thirty-nine percent of Americans go to church at least once a week, and 17% say they attend once or twice a month. Only one-fifth say they attend services seldom (13%) or never (9%). A substantial percentage report daily religious activities. Fully 51% pray at least once a day, and 29% pray several times a day. And 60% of Americans say grace before meals.

Almost Half Watch Religious TV

Large pluralities watch religious TV programs and/or listen to religious radio shows (45%) or listen to Christian music (45%). More than one-half of Americans are involved in community volunteer work through their place of worship (55%). A smaller, though substantial number attend prayer group meetings or Bible study (31%), and only 15% report sending a son or daughter to a religious school.

More women than men say religion is very important in their life (69% vs. 47%). Blacks, those 50 years and older and less well educated Americans are more apt to report that religion is personally important to them than are their demographic counterparts. (See table, p.41)

The two groups that are farthest apart in political terms -- white evangelical Christians and Black Christians -- are close in their strong religious beliefs and practices. White Catholics, especially progressives, typically express less religious faith and commitment than either of these groups. In this regard, mainline Protestants are the least religious of the major Christian groupings.

Nearly all white evangelical Protestants and black Christians say religion is very important in their life (85% and 93%, respectively). Slightly more than one-half of white Catholics profess the importance of religion (54%), as do 46% of white mainline Protestants. Traditional Catholics, however, view religion as more important than do progressives (64% vs. 47%).

The same pattern emerges on religious practices, particularly with respect to church attendance and prayer. In addition, evangelical Protestants and black Christians are significantly more likely than all other groups to listen to Christian music, watch religious programs and attend prayer groups or Bible study. White Catholics are least likely to listen to Christian music, watch religious programs or attend Bible study; however, they are twice as likely to send a son or daughter to a religious school (30% vs. 15% for the general public).

II. RELIGION AND POLITICS

Four major elements were considered in evaluating the relationship between politics and religion: affiliation, commitment, belief, and Evangelicalism. Affiliation refers to an individual's self-described religious preference. Commitment is measured by salience of religion in one's life, church attendance and frequency of prayer. Christian belief is measured by belief in God, the afterlife, heaven and hell. And Evangelicalism is a measure of whether individuals consider themselves born again or evangelical Christians.

All of these elements are interrelated and each is clearly linked to political views and attitudes. Strong religious commitment and strong belief contribute to conservative political views, and religious affiliation is a good indicator of political attitudes. However, one element stands out among all others. Self-identification as an evangelical Christian is the strongest link between religion and politics. Evangelicalism when combined with race is more politically significant than affiliation, commitment and belief; and when viewed in combination with commitment, it is an extraordinarily powerful predictor of political views.

White evangelical Protestants are more conservative, more Republican, and more anti-Clinton than any other major religious group in America. Furthermore, those evangelicals who are also strongly committed to their faith are among the most politically active citizens in the country. Nearly two-thirds of committed evangelicals are highly likely to vote in the 1996 election, compared to about half of the general public. The fact that this group expresses a consistent set of conservative political attitudes and is extremely active politically makes evangelical Christians a powerful voting bloc.

The Politics of Evangelical Protestants

White evangelical Protestants constitute 23% of the voting age population and 25% of all registered voters, approximately the same proportion represented by white mainline Protestants. They are more likely than any other major religious group to identify themselves as Republicans. Forty-one percent of all white evangelical Protestants are Republican, and nearly half (49%) of highly committed evangelicals assume the GOP label. This is roughly 20% points above the national average; 30% of all Americans identify themselves as Republicans.

The partisanship of white evangelicals is also expressed through their extreme dislike of Bill Clinton. While 54% of the public approves of the job the president is doing, only a third of committed evangelicals concur. Fully 60% of this group disapproves of Clinton and nearly as many hold an unfavorable opinion of the president. Evangelicals do not share the public's skepticism about the policies of the GOP Congress; more than half of highly committed evangelicals endorse the Republican congressional agenda, compared to only 36% of the public.

White evangelical Protestants favor Dole over Clinton in a hypothetical 1996 match-up by a margin of 60% to 36%. Among the public at large, Clinton holds a commanding 15 percentage point lead over Dole. The same pattern holds true at the congressional level. Two-thirds of highly committed evangelicals say they would vote for the Republican candidate from their congressional district (as do 59% of all white evangelical Protestants). Only 28% say they would vote for the Democrat. The general public favors Democrats over Republicans by a margin of 50% to 44%.

Evangelicals are highly critical of Hillary Clinton, even more so than they are of her husband; 62% of highly committed evangelicals have an unfavorable opinion of the First Lady. Interestingly, they are less likely than the general public to perceive the First Lady as a religious person. Among the public 25% characterize Mrs. Clinton as "not too religious" or "not at all religious." Among committed evangelicals, that number is as high as 44%.

They hold a generally favorable view of Dole and are more likely than the public at large to view the Congress in a favorable light. Committed evangelicals are the only religious group that holds a clear majority favorable opinion of Congress.

Not surprisingly, evangelical Christians are more likely than members of other religious groups to give high favorability ratings to Pat Robertson. Nearly half of all white evangelical Protestants express a favorable opinion of the conservative Christian leader and former presidential candidate (compared to 29% of the general public). They are even more likely to express a favorable view of the Christian Coalition; 64% of all white evangelical Protestants and 78% of the most committed among them give the Christian Coalition a favorable rating. Only 35% of mainline Protestants hold this political arm of the Christian right in such high esteem. More (44%) have a negative opinion of it.

Trend analysis suggests that over the last decade or so, white evangelical Protestants have become increasingly politicized. In 1987, 35% of white evangelical Protestants described themselves as Republicans, 29% were Democrats and 36% were Independents. Today, 41% of white evangelical Protestants call themselves Republicans, a full 11% points higher than the general public. Only 28% are Democrats and 29% are Independents. Over that same period of time, the party affiliation of white mainline Protestants has remained much more constant. Looking over a longer period, GOP affiliation among white evangelicals has climbed 16% points since 1978, while Republican adherence increased by 8% points among other Americans. While the GOP's growing popularity among white evangelicals is a national phenomenon, the trend is more pronounced in the South than in other regions of the country.

The politicalization of the evangelical right can be seen even more clearly in terms of presidential preference. In May of 1988 white evangelical Protestants supported George Bush over Michael Dukakis by a margin of 53% to 40%; mainline Protestants favored Dukakis over Bush by a narrow 48% to 46% margin. Eight years later, the evangelicals support Dole over Clinton by a staggering 60% to 36% margin; while the "mainliners" support Clinton over Dole by a margin of 52% to 42%. The gap between evangelical and mainline Protestants has grown substantially over the last eight years, and most of that can be attributed to the movement among evangelicals toward the Republican party.

The Politics of Other Religious Groups

The other major racial and religious groups identified in the survey also show distinct partisan patterns.

Black Christians: Black Christians are as partisan in their political views as are white evangelical Protestants, if not more so. Just as these two groups stand out in terms of their religious beliefs and levels of commitment, they express some of the strongest and most consistent political views.

Black Christians are more likely than any other major religious group to approve of the job Bill Clinton is doing and to disapprove of the policies of the GOP Congress. They are also the most likely to say they will vote for Clinton over Dole in 1996 and the Democratic candidate for Congress in their district. It is important to note that race, rather than religious faith, is the dominant force driving the political beliefs of black Christians. Even so, black non-Christians are less partisan than black Christians.

Black Christians hold highly favorable opinions of both President Clinton (85% favorable) and Hillary Clinton (75% favorable). Only one-in-five say their opinion of Bob Dole is favorable while fully 64% express an unfavorable opinion of the former Senate majority leader. Not surprisingly, black Christians are more likely than any other religious group to give high favorability ratings to Nation of Islam leader Louis Farrakhan. Still, even among blacks, Farrakhan remains a polarizing figure: 44% of blacks give him a favorable rating; 38% rate him unfavorably.

In spite of their strong partisanship, black Christians are less politicized than white evangelical Protestants in one very important respect -- they are less politically active. Only 30% of Black Christians say they follow what's going on in government most of the time, compared to 42% of white evangelical Protestants. Perhaps more importantly, only 45% of black Christians could be characterized as likely 1996 voters, this compares with 54% of white evangelical Protestants and 64% of highly committed white evangelicals.

White Mainline Protestants: White mainline Protestants express less partisan political attitudes than their evangelical counterparts. They are more Republican than the public at large, but no less approving of Bill Clinton. Even among highly committed mainline Protestants, a majority (54%) approves of the job Clinton is doing. This is in stark contrast to the 33% of highly committed evangelicals who say they approve.

In short, mainline Protestants resemble the general public politically. Their political views mirror those of the public on approval of the GOP Congress as well as on presidential and congressional preference. Traditionally, mainline Protestants have been strong supporters of GOP presidential candidates. Today, however, they favor Clinton over Dole by a 10% point margin. Commitment does not seem to translate into a more conservative viewpoint for mainliners as it does for white evangelical Protestants. Highly committed mainline Protestants are not significantly more conservative than less committed mainliners.

White mainline Protestants do differ from the general public in one important respect; they are more interested in politics and more likely to vote in the 1996 election.

Jewish Americans: Jewish Americans are among the most Democratic of all religious groups, second only to black Christians. Nearly half of all Jews (46%) are Democrats, 37% are Independents, and a mere 15% are Republicans. They give President Clinton higher approval ratings than any other major religious group, with the exception of black Christians. It should be noted, however, that more highly religious Jews tend to be more conservative on moral issues and on some key political measures than less religious Jews.

Mormons: At the other end of the partisan spectrum are Mormons. Representing about 2% of the population, Mormons are the most Republican religious group in America, surpassing even white evangelical Protestants. Some 45% of Mormons claim GOP party allegiance, 32% are Independents, and only one-in-five are Democrats.

Hispanic Americans: Hispanics are more Democratic than Republican, but large numbers identify themselves as Independents (37%, 21%, and 39%, respectively). Slight differences exist between Hispanic Catholics and non-Catholics, with non-Catholics more likely to ally themselves with the Republican party (24% vs. 18% of Catholics).

The Non-Religious: Whites who express no religious preference are a largely non-partisan group. More than half (52%) are political Independents. Those that do claim a party affiliation are more Democratic than Republican (26% vs. 18%).

White Catholics: Unlike the days when Catholics were a stronghold of the Democratic party, today's white Catholics divide themselves evenly among the Republican, Democratic and Independent parties. They give the President high approval ratings (60% approve vs. 34% disapprove), and most are inclined to vote for Clinton over Dole in 1996 (62% vs. 33%).

Catholics who describe themselves as "progressive" express slightly more liberal political views than those that call themselves "traditional." Progressive Catholics are slightly more likely than traditionalists to approve of the job Bill Clinton is doing, less likely to approve of the GOP congressional agenda, and less likely to have a favorable opinion of Bob Dole. They are also less likely than traditionalists to say they would vote for a Republican for Congress in 1996.

In religious terms, these two groups diverge in their opinions of Pope John Paul II. While an overwhelming majority of Catholics give the Pope a favorable rating, traditional Catholics are far more likely than progressive Catholics to characterize their opinion as "very favorable" (60% vs. 40%, respectively).

Denominational Politics: The various Protestant denominations differ significantly in their political leanings. Non-denominational white Protestants and white Presbyterians are the two most Republican groups; they are also the two groups most likely to describe themselves as conservative (63% of Presbyterians and 56% of Non-denominationals are conservative, compared to 41% of the general public). One important difference between these two groups is that while a majority of Non-denominationals are born again or evangelical, most Presbyterians do not self-identify as such. They are the only clearly conservative group among the mainline denominations.

Both the Non-denominationals and the Presbyterians are less likely to have a favorable opinion of Clinton and more likely to vote for Dole in 1996 than members of most other Protestant denominations. They are also much more likely than the public at large to express unfavorable views about Hillary Clinton. Fully six-in-ten Non-denominationals hold an unfavorable opinion of the First Lady, compared to 46% of the general public.

At the other end of the ideological spectrum are liberal-leaning white Methodists. They are more supportive of President Clinton, more disapproving of the GOP Congress, and more likely to give Hillary Clinton -- a fellow Methodist -- a favorable rating than any other major Protestant denomination.

Commitment and Belief

Aside from religious affiliation, the intensity of religious commitment and belief also has an impact on political attitudes. Religious commitment among whites is linked to party identification, with more highly committed individuals showing much stronger alliance with the Republican party when compared to whites with a low level of commitment. Four-in-ten highly committed whites are Republicans compared to only 28% of weakly committed whites. The same pattern holds true among whites for strong vs. weak believers. Nearly 40% of those with strong Christian beliefs identify themselves as Republicans; the same can be said of only 24% of the nonbelievers.

Political Activism

White Protestants are slightly more likely than Catholics and significantly more likely than black Christians to vote in 1996. And highly committed Protestants are the most likely of all to turn out (65% of highly committed white evangelical Protestants and 61% of committed white mainline Protestants are very likely to vote in 1996). The non-religious are less likely than any other group to participate next November.

No one religious group stands out as more politically active. Less than 10% of the general public report having attended a political meeting, rally, speech, or other such event in 1994. By this measure, religious Americans are no more politically active than the non-religious. Some 8% of white mainline Protestants say they attended such an event in 1994; 6% of white evangelical Protestants report doing the same as do 8% of white Catholics and 10% of black Christians. But among the small group of Americans (7%) who say they are members of the religious right political movement, 14% report attending a political meeting or rally in 1994.

III. RELIGION AND POLITICAL VALUES ⁸

White evangelical Protestants and Mormons hold much more conservative values than members of other religious groups. They are the least accepting of homosexuality, the most in favor of keeping "dangerous" books off public library shelves, and take a hard line on security issues. Significant minorities of white evangelicals oppose environmental regulations and doubt the wisdom of sending women into the workplace. Though white mainline Protestants and Catholics are more moderate on issues like homosexuality, they join evangelicals in expressing unsympathetic attitudes toward the poor and immigrants. Jews consistently express the most liberal values. They are the most tolerant of gays, the most likely to think environmental regulations are worth the cost, and among whites the most liberal on racial issues. Black Christians occasionally move toward the conservative end of the policy spectrum, expressing significant concern about the economic cost of environmental regulations, but also show the most support for the poor and are among the most likely to favor non-military solutions to international problems.

Social Tolerance: The Big Divide

Americans of different faiths differ most notably on questions of social tolerance, particularly homosexuality. For example, a large majority of Jews (79%) and non-religious whites (66%) believe that society should accept homosexuality as a way of life, while a near equal number of white Protestant evangelicals (72%) believe that society should discourage the gay lifestyle. White mainline Protestants and Catholics are more narrowly divided on the question, with a bare majority agreeing that society should accept homosexuals (52%). Black Christians split evenly on the question.

A similarly powerful divide appears on the question of banning books, with white Protestant evangelicals more likely (60%) than white mainline Protestants (39%) to say that books containing dangerous ideas should be banned from public school libraries. Black Christians are the only religious group aside from evangelicals and Mormons in which a majority favors banning dangerous books (53% in favor). More than two-thirds of Jews and non-religious whites believe that public school libraries should be allowed to carry any books they want.

Persistent Religious Patterns

It is no surprise that religion matters on moral issues such as homosexuality. More surprising, perhaps, is the fact that on a whole host of political values less directly tied to morality, religious differences persist.

Social Welfare: White Christians and Hispanics take a less sympathetic view of the poor than Jews or blacks. In a rare show of unanimity among white Christian denominations, over half of white Protestants, Catholics and the non-religious believe that poor people today have it easy because they can get government benefits. They are joined in this belief by a narrow majority of Hispanic Catholics and non-Catholics. On the other hand, 44% of Jews think that poor people have hard lives, compared to 39% who think the poor have it easy. The strongest sympathy for the plight of the poor is found among black Christians (66% think the poor have hard lives).

A slim majority of mainline and evangelical Christians also share the view that the government today can't afford to do much to help the needy. White Catholics are more divided on this question. Jews are the only white group in the population who favor more government aid. Large percentages of blacks, and to a lesser extent Hispanics, also favor such measures.

The Environment: Most Americans feel that environmental regulations are worth the cost, but there is less support for this position among white evangelical Protestants than among their Protestant brethren. Over forty percent of white evangelical Protestants (42%) and Mormons (46%) agree that stricter environmental laws cost too many jobs and hurt the economy, compared to less than a third of white mainline Protestants and white Catholics. Black Christians and Hispanics tend more toward the evangelical position on the issue. Jewish Americans express the most support for the worth of environmental regulations.

Security Issues: On security issues, white evangelical Protestants and Mormons take the hardest line. While almost 60% of Americans believe that the best way to insure peace is through diplomacy, evangelicals are split on the issue, with almost half agreeing that peace is best insured through military strength. Mormons follow a similar path, trailed by mainline Protestants and Catholics. In contrast, about two-thirds of Jews and minority groups feel diplomacy is a more effective way of ensuring peace.

Race: A substantial majority of Christians feel the problems of blacks are of their own making, rather than a consequence of racial discrimination. Jews are the only white group where there is a close division of opinion on this issue. Among white Christians, evangelical Protestants are marginally more likely to say that blacks who cannot get ahead are responsible for their own condition (66%), but mainline Protestants and Catholics are not far behind. A majority of Hispanic Catholics also believe blacks are responsible (56%), unlike non-Catholic Hispanics, who are more divided on the issue. Finally, a majority of blacks point to racial discrimination (though one-third agree that blacks themselves are responsible).

Women in the Workplace: Despite the increasing demand for a revival of traditional family values, three-quarters of Americans think that society has benefited from women's presence in the workplace. Support for this position is weakest, however, among white evangelical Protestants, and particularly among those who have a high commitment to their faith. Among this latter group of high-commitment evangelicals, 37% claim that society made a mistake in encouraging so many women with families to work.

Religious Consensus: Political Cynicism

Finally, there are a few political values which are shared. There are virtually no differences by religious affiliation on the issue of corporate power in America (most people think too much power is concentrated in the hands of a few large companies.) Across church and synagogue Americans also do not differ in their impressions of elected officials. Within each religious denomination, at least two-thirds of respondents agree that elected officials in Washington lose touch with the people pretty quickly. A similar number feel that most elected officials do not care what they think.

Religion and Other Factors

The significance of religious orientation is independent of other traditional political influences such as age, race, sex, education and region. While religion is certainly correlated with these factors, its influence is not just a consequence of this correlation. Analysis shows that this is true both for moral issues such as homosexuality and for policy issues such as environmental regulation and racial progress.⁹

For example, strong support for the military among evangelicals is not just a consequence of the fact that evangelicals tend to live in the pro-military south. Even in the South, evangelicals take a stronger pro-military point of view than mainline Protestants.

IV. RELIGION AND POLICY ISSUES

Moral Issues: An Explicit and Conservative Religious Connection

The U.S. public remains divided over abortion, with just over half believing that abortion should be generally available, or available with minor restrictions, while 42% believe that it should be prohibited entirely, or available only in cases of rape, incest, or threat to the life of the mother. These divisions are drawn largely along religious lines, with mainline Protestants (72%), progressive Catholics (73%), and the non-religious (74%) generally pro-choice in orientation, evangelical Protestants strongly pro-life, and black Christians and traditional Catholics falling in between but tipping toward the pro-life side (57% and 55% pro-life, respectively). Among white evangelical Protestants, roughly two-thirds (65%) believe abortion should be prohibited or highly restricted, and among white evangelicals with a strong religious commitment, 83% take this conservative view.

About half (51%) of the pro-life respondents in the survey said that their religious beliefs were the most important influence on their opinion about abortion. Among the highly religious evangelical Protestants holding pro-life views, three fourths attributed their abortion opinions to their religious beliefs. And among pro-life black Christians and traditional Catholics, nearly six-in-ten did so (56% and 58% respectively).

A similar pattern is evident on the issue of gay and lesbian marriage. By a 65% to 28% margin the public opposes legalized gay and lesbian marriage. Opposition is even more intense among white evangelical Protestants, 84% of whom are opposed (64% strongly opposed). And among the most religiously committed evangelicals, 89% are opposed. There is a 17% point difference in opinion between progressive and traditional Catholics, with 68% of traditional Catholics opposed to gay and lesbian marriage, compared with 51% among progressives. Non-religious respondents divide nearly evenly on the question, with 45% in favor and 46% opposed. Mainline Protestants and black Christians break down much like the sample as a whole.

Religious beliefs are at the heart of conservative opinion on this issue by people's own accounts. A little over half (52%) of those opposed to gay and lesbian marriage say that their religious views are the most important influence on their attitude. Among highly committed white evangelical Protestants, 84% of those opposed to gay and lesbian marriage credit their religious beliefs as responsible for their opinion.

Higher levels of education generally bring more tolerant or liberal attitudes on social issues such as homosexuality. But the power of religious belief is such that among born again respondents, the liberalizing influence of education on attitudes about homosexuality is neutralized. There is no difference in attitude by educational level among the born again.

Percent Who Say Society Should Accept Homosexuality
----- Educational level -----
	Less than High School	High School	Some College	College Graduate
All	Diploma	Graduate	College	Graduate

Total	46	36	43	50	55

Over three-fourths (76%) of Americans support allowing schools to distribute information about birth control. Even among traditional Catholics, 71% are supportive. But a 52% to 45% majority of highly committed evangelicals are opposed.

Many evangelicals also take a different view from the rest of the nation on the question of whether society has made a mistake in encouraging women with families to enter the work force. As with birth control information in the schools, there is a strong national consensus that society has benefited from women entering the work force rather than made a mistake in encouraging women to work (76% to 19%). Religious commitment makes very little difference to most people's opinions, except among the most committed white evangelical Protestants, 37% of whom feel that society has made a mistake. Among highly committed evangelicals concerned about women entering the work force, about 30% said that their religious beliefs were the most important influence on their opinion.

Religion and the Death Penalty: “An Eye for an Eye” or “Thou Shalt Not Kill”?

Americans evidence a strong consensus in favor of the death penalty. The Center survey found 78% in favor of the death penalty for persons convicted of murder with just 18% opposed. There is relatively little difference in opinion across religious groups, except black Christians who are less supportive than others (54% in favor, 35% opposed). But the lack of variation across religions masks a relatively strong role for religious beliefs in opinions on this issue.

Overall, 19% of Pew's respondents cited religious beliefs as the most important influence on their opinion about the death penalty, a level of influence about equal to that of the mass media, education, and miscellaneous other factors. What is especially interesting about the role of religion is that, unlike the social issues of abortion and homosexuality, religion’s influence is about equally divided between the liberal and conservative positions on this issue. Among those citing religion as most important, about half (52%) favor the death penalty, while 41% are opposed.

Religious beliefs are particularly important for the pro-death penalty sentiments of highly committed white evangelical Protestants (39% of whom cite religious beliefs as the most important influence), and for the anti-death penalty views of black Christians (57% cite religious reasons as most important).

U.S. Involvement in Bosnia

Attitudes about the U.S. military mission in Bosnia draw upon a range of conflicting considerations, some of which are religiously-based. On the one hand, the humanitarian nature of the mission, and in particular, the effort to stop war crimes that have a religious origin, may lead many religious Americans to support the U.S. efforts. On the other hand, a general skepticism about the use of military force has been a hallmark of several religious traditions in America and may lead many citizens to oppose the mission.

Despite the seeming success of the mission, Americans continue to be divided on support of President Clinton’s Bosnian decision, with 43% favoring involvement and 52% opposing it. Support for the mission is lower among white evangelicals (34%) than among white mainline Protestants (44%). Those who profess no religious affiliation (50%) and progressive Catholics (58%) are the most supportive. Differences between mainline and evangelical Protestants are not simply a consequence of greater Republican identification, and thus opposition to President Clinton, among the evangelicals. Among Republicans, there was no difference in support between mainline and evangelical Protestants, but among Democrats and Independents, the evangelicals are considerably less supportive.

	All %	Rep %	Dem %	Indep %
White Mainline Protestant	44	28	61	50

Government Assistance for the Poor

Although the plight of the poor is a common theme in most religious traditions, and was the issue most commonly mentioned by church-going respondents as being discussed by their clergy (87%), there is little evidence of direct religious influence on public opinion about government assistance to the poor. Differences across religious groups in the survey are relatively modest, with the exception of black Christians, who are substantially more liberal than the average (77% in favor of more government assistance, compared with 48% for the general public) and highly committed white evangelicals, who are somewhat more conservative (36% in favor of more government help). Traditional Catholics are 9% points more liberal on the issue than are self-described progressive Catholics.

Only about 6% of respondents said that religious beliefs were the most important influence on their attitudes about government aid to the poor. But, of these, three-fourths (75%) took the liberal position on the issue.

On another issue related to the poor -- the provision of welfare benefits to unwed teenagers who have children -- there are only modest differences among religious groups. Interestingly, among Republicans, evangelicals are 13% points less likely than non-evangelicals to favor denying benefits to teenage parents. Although the survey did not probe the issue specifically, this difference is consistent with the interpretation that many evangelicals oppose the cutoff because of fears that such a move would encourage more teens to have abortions.

Attitudes about Blacks

Most Americans -- 57% overall -- feel that blacks who cannot get ahead bear more responsibility for this condition than does racial discrimination. White evangelicals are slightly more likely than other religious groups (67%) to blame blacks rather than discrimination. And progressive Catholics (64%) are 10% points more likely than traditional Catholics (54%) to feel this way.

V. POLITICKING IN THE CHURCH

Americans who attend church at least once or twice a month report hearing their clergy speak out from the pulpit on a whole range of social and political issues. Hunger and poverty are addressed by clergy more often than any other topic; 87% of churchgoers say their clergy preaches on these issues. Abortion and world trouble spots such as Bosnia and Rwanda are popular topics for ministers and other clergy; 60% of churchgoers say they hear about these issues in church. Prayer in public schools, pornography and homosexuality are also discussed frequently. Less prevalent, though still talked about, are euthanasia, the death penalty, health care reform, and candidates and elections.

The extent to which different issues are addressed from the pulpit varies widely across Christian denominations, and the starkest contrasts can be found between mainline Protestant churches and white evangelical churches. Moral issues, such as abortion, prayer in school, and homosexuality are addressed much more frequently by evangelical clergy than by mainline Protestant ministers.

The Evangelical Agenda

Two-thirds of all churchgoing white evangelical Protestants say their minister speaks out on abortion. Just over a third of all white mainline Protestants say their preacher addresses this issue. Seven-in-ten evangelicals report hearing about prayer in school from their clergy compared to less than half of mainliners. Many more evangelicals than mainliners report that their ministers have preached on pornography (59% vs. 26%). And nearly twice as many evangelicals have heard their clergy address the issue of homosexuality from the pulpit. In each case, highly committed evangelicals report an even higher incidence of politicking from the pulpit, possibly because this group is spending even more time in church than their less committed fellow evangelicals.

Only on the issue of world trouble spots do mainline Protestants report significantly more discussion by clergy than their evangelical counterparts. Nearly 70% of white mainline Protestants say their clergy speaks out on these types of issues, compared to 55% of evangelicals. Next to hunger and poverty, this is the issue that mainliners report hearing about most often in church.

The death penalty, right to die laws, and health care reform are brought up slightly more often in evangelical churches than in mainline churches, according to those who attend. However, these issues do not appear to dominate the agendas of the clergy in either venue.

The Catholic Agenda

White Catholics report hearing about abortion in church at a higher rate than any other major religious group. Three out of every four white Catholics who attend church say their clergy speaks out on this issue. Catholics are much less likely than evangelicals to say their clergy speaks out on other moral issues such as prayer in school (40% vs. 71% of evangelicals) and homosexuality (19% vs. 45% of evangelicals).

On certain issues, self-described traditional and progressive Catholics report different levels of politicking by their clergy. Traditional Catholics are much more likely than progressives to say their priest speaks out on pornography (42% vs. 26%). Traditional Catholics are also more likely than progressives to have heard about right to die laws, homosexuality, and health care reform in church.

The Black Christian Agenda

Black Christians are more likely than any other major religious group to report that their clergy speaks out on overtly political issues. Nearly half (47%) say their minister speaks out on candidates and elections -- more than twice the percentage of white evangelicals who report the same. And more than 60% say their minister speaks out on health care reform.

Blacks are also more likely than most others churchgoers to hear about school prayer, homosexuality, and the death penalty in church. They are less likely than both evangelicals and Catholics to say their preacher addresses the issue of abortion.

The Southern Agenda

Regional patterns also emerge. Churchgoers in the South hear their ministers preach on moral issues such as school prayer, homosexuality and pornography more often than those in other parts of the country. Relative to other regions, clergy in southern churches, according to their parishioners, preach less often about world trouble spots and right to die laws.

In the East, more church politicking is done on abortion, hunger and world trouble spots. Pornography and homosexuality are discussed less often in the East than elsewhere.

On a whole range of issues, churchgoers in the West report far less politicking by clergy than those in other regions of the country. This is most apparent on the issue of prayer in school, where only 40% of westerners say their clergy speaks out on the issue. This compares with 60% of church attenders in other parts of the country.

While people of various religious faiths report hearing their clergy speak out on certain issues, far fewer say their clergy or any other religious group urged them to vote in a particular way in the 1994 congressional elections. Only 4% of white mainline Protestants say they were urged to vote one way or another. White Catholics report this type of politicking in church at about an equal rate. Twice as many (8%) white evangelical Protestants say they were urged to vote in a particular way either by their clergy or by some religious group. Among the major religious groups, black Christians are the most likely to report a direct religious influence on their 1994 vote; 13% say their clergy or some other religious group tried to affect their vote choice.

Churchgoers more often report having received information on candidates or parties through their churches before the 1994 election. Nearly 15% of all churchgoers said such information was made available to them. White evangelical Protestants are much more likely than white mainline Protestants to report this (18% vs. 3%), and highly committed evangelicals report receiving campaign materials at an ever greater rate (24%).

Again, this type of politicking appears to be most prevalent in black Christian churches. Nearly 30% of black Christians say they received political information at church prior to the election.

Opinion About Politicking in the Church

Although white evangelical Protestants and black Christians stand far apart in their politics, they are united in feeling that churches should speak out on politics. More than two-in-three in each group take that position (70% and 67%, respectively).

White mainline Protestants and white Catholics divide evenly on the general question of whether churches should express their political views. But, highly committed mainline Protestants do not favor church involvement in politics any more than other mainline Protestants.

Surprisingly, younger Americans more often than seniors feel that churches should express their views on politics (58% vs. 42%), and they are also more supportive of clergy speaking on politics directly from the pulpit (34% vs. 19%). College graduates are more likely than high school graduates to favor politicking from the pulpit (36% vs. 26%), as are Republicans compared to Democrats (34% vs. 26%).

Large majorities of churchgoers whose leaders speak out on specific issues feel this is a good thing. Clergy who discuss prayer in public schools get a good reaction from 92% of parishioners. Discussion of laws regarding homosexuals draws a favorable response from 83%. Somewhat fewer (78%) give their clergy a good response for speaking about candidates and elections.

White evangelical Protestants and black Christians again are most supportive of their clergy discussing laws about homosexuality (88% and 87%, respectively). White mainline Protestants and white Catholics are decidedly less supportive (74% and 68%, respectively). Black Christians are more likely than other religious groups to feel it is a good thing for clergy to discuss candidates from the pulpit (87%).

A Christian Nation?

Six -in-ten Americans consider the United States a Christian nation. Dissent on this question comes from the least religious and most religious elements in the county. People under 30 years of age and those who profess no religion are least likely to feel this way (48%, 46%, respectively). Similarly, the highly committed white evangelical Christians and black Christians are less likely than the average to consider the U.S. a Christian nation (53% and 48% respectively). Seven-in-ten white mainline Protestants (69%) and white Catholics (70%) say the U.S. is a Christian nation.

SURVEY METHODOLOGY

ABOUT THIS SURVEY

The survey results are based on telephone interviews conducted under the direction of Princeton Survey Research Associates among a nationwide sample of 1,975 adults, 18 years of age or older, during the period May 31-June 9, 1996. For results based on the total sample, one can say with 95% confidence that the error attributable to sampling and other random effects is plus or minus 3 percentage points. For results based on either Form 1 (N=998) or Form 2 (N=977), the sampling error is plus or minus 4 percentage points.

In addition to sampling error, one should bear in mind that question wording and practical difficulties in conducting surveys can introduce error or bias into the findings of opinion polls.

Supplemental analysis for this survey is based on a compilation of nationwide surveys. The total number of interviews included in this data set is 9,652. Surveys were conducted during the following time periods: July 12-25, 1994; October 20-24, 1994; April 6-9, 1995; October 25-30, 1995.

SURVEY METHODOLOGY IN DETAIL

The sample for this survey is a random digit sample of telephone numbers selected from telephone exchanges in the continental United States. The random digit aspect of the sample is used to avoid "listing" bias and provides representation of both listed and unlisted numbers (including not-yet-listed). The design of the sample ensures this representation by random generation of the last two digits of telephone numbers selected on the basis of their area code, telephone exchange, and bank number.

The telephone exchanges were selected with probabilities proportional to their size. The first eight digits of the sampled telephone numbers (area code, telephone exchange, bank number) were selected to be proportionally stratified by county and by telephone exchange within county. That is, the number of telephone numbers randomly sampled from within a given county is proportional to that county's share of telephone households in the U.S. Estimates of the number of telephone households within each county are derived from 1990 Census data on residential telephone incidence that have been updated with state-level information on new telephone installations and county-level projections of the number of households. Only working banks of telephone numbers are selected. A working bank is defined as 100 contiguous telephone numbers containing three or more residential listings.

The sample was released for interviewing in replicates. Using replicates to control the release of sample to the field ensures that the complete call procedures are followed for the entire sample.

At least eight attempts were made to complete an interview at every sampled telephone number. The calls were staggered over times of day and days of the week to maximize the chances of making a contact with a potential respondent. All interview breakoffs and refusals were re-contacted at least once in order to attempt to convert them to completed interviews. In each contacted household, interviewers asked to speak with the "youngest male 18 or older who is at home". If there is no eligible man at home, interviewers asked to speak with "the oldest woman 18 or older who lives in the household". This systematic respondent selection technique has been shown empirically to produce samples that closely mirror the population in terms of age and gender.

Non-response in telephone interview surveys produces some known biases in survey-derived estimates because participation tends to vary for different subgroups of the population, and these subgroups are likely to vary also on questions of substantive interest. In order to compensate for these known biases, the sample data are weighted in analysis.

The demographic weighting parameters are derived from a special analysis of the most recently available Census Bureau's Current Population Survey (March 1992). This analysis produced population parameters for the demographic characteristics of households with adults 18 or older, which are then compared with the sample characteristics to construct sample weights. The analysis only included households in the continental United States that contain a telephone.

The weights are derived using an iterative technique that simultaneously balances the distributions of all weighting parameters. After an optimum sample balancing solution is reached, the weights were constrained to fall within the range of 1 to 5. This constraint is useful to ensure that individual respondents do not exert an inordinate effect on the survey's overall results.
